Twenty-five years ago

the world's most famous aviatrix was missing over the Pacific. Amelia Earhart, on a globe-girdling flight with navigator Fred Noonan, took off for the hop over trackless ocean wastes and was never heard from again. On the chance that she might be safe on some then-remote island, an intensive air-sea search got underway immediately, but not even wreckage was ever found. Many and a varied possibility have been the theories on the disappearance - such as the one that she wandered to the Island of Truk, then being secretly fortified by the Japanese, and was executed to keep those plans secret. For a quarter-century the world has wondered. (LITE)

~~Twenty~~

Twenty-five years ago the Russians were setting air records just as they are today. Three Russian airmen landed south of Los Angeles after a flight from Moscow over the North Pole. They set a distance record of six thousand six hundred miles, a thousand miles further than the record set four years previously by two Frenchmen. The huge single-engine motored plane was undamaged in landing and the three airmen suffered no injuries - they returned later to Russia, and to Russian ~~celebrations~~ cheers that were to echo twenty-five years later for Soviet spacemen. The nation was in the grip of a record heat wave — everybody was talking about the weather and most everybody was doing something about it. As the Mercury climbed and climbed and climbed, the kids were quick to improvise with showers in city streets ... those elders who weren't red with the heat turned green with envy. (LITE)

Secretaries figured out a way to get dictation down to a cold science. ✓

And fan mah brow if inventors didn't come up with

A huge air-sea search fails to find any clue to the disappearance of AMELIA EARHART and her navigator, who were lost in the Pacific.

The RUSSIAN AIRMEN were setting records 25 years ago, too. Three men set a new mark in flying over the North Pole from Moscow to Los Angeles.

The HEAT was setting a RECORD and so were those who were thinking up goofy ways to beat the heat. They may not have beat the heat but they had fun trying.....
