Gary Raymond saved filed from Jim Garrison's investigation of Clay Shaw in New Orleans from current District Attorney Harry Connick's (Sr.) orders to Raymond to "burn" the grand jury testimonies. Raymond not only didn't burn them, but just last year he finally turned his long held copies over to reporter Angelico on the condition that Angelico give them to the voter-mandated Assassination Records Review Board. Now, both Raymond and Angelico are being charged with contempt of court for breaking the seal of secrecy on these grand jury records. Curiously, two other writers were allowed access to the grand jury records and wrote about them - one in the New York Times, one in the Washington Times. These authors are Gerald Posner, author of that grossly dishonest book CASE CLOSED, and Hugh Aynesworth, author of equally dishonest articles about Garrison during this investigation. Of course, these "lone nut" authors have NOT been charged with contempt of court. The case here is that if one is to apply a law, it should at least be applied equally to all offenders - not just to those whose revelations suit the government's case. And more importantly, these records are nearly 30 years old now. Most of the people who testified have since died. And now we have the JFK Act, that mandates a release of all government records relating to the Kennedy assassination. So which law should take precedence? The one forbidding release? Or the one demanding it at a point in time where its hard to make a case that anyone could be hurt by the release of 30 year old grand jury testimony? I hope some of you excellent writers and journalists will take up the cause of free speech in this important matter, and write the District Attorney's office, the Times Picayune, or the local weekly called Gambit, expressing concern that a journalist and a public servant will go to jail for trying to get the truth to the American people. If anyone wants more details on this, read this file and follow the links to the related articles: <http://www.webcom.com/ctka/alert.html> Write Harry at the New Orleans DA's office: Mr. Harry Connick District Attorney 619 South White Street New Orleans LA 70119 The phone number of his office is (504) 822-2414.
