Subject: Re: House Government Reform and Oversight Committee History

Hi, Tom. I am feeling better today, thank you. Don Goldberg was the primary contact with the Gov Operations Committee from the beginning. There was a second individual, Democratic staffer, but I do not remember his name. There was very little Republican involvement at the beginning on the House side, but I do remember a meeting (along with Goldberg) with the minority counsel of either the committee or the subcommittee, I think his name was Kevin Sabo. (I heard his name again awhile ago, I think that he has moved up in the Congressional Republican world). Don is very helpful -- you should feel free to call him at the White House -- his advice is always solid, and he is a strong supporter not only of the legislation, but of the work that we have done. By the way, could you give me a suggestion? You know the assassination literature much better than I do. Could you list the five books you would suggest that someone could read to understand the various competing conspiracies (or lack of conspiracies) surrounding the assassination? I am constantly getting requests from people to provide the five best books or the five books that will give someone a good sense for the event. I thought you could do a better job of a list, than I can. I assume "Case Closed" would be on the list as the defense of single-bullet, but what else would you add? Thanks. JRT

Judge: I was sorry to hear that you were not feeling well and I hope that you get better soon. It couldn't be nerves over the Minnesota v. Kentucky game! The purpose of this memo is to seek your help on the history of your contacts with the House Government Reform and Oversight Committee. Congressman Burton's staff was trying to find out who was still around the Committee who knew the history of our authorizing legislation. I know you dealt with Don Goldberg(now at the White House, I understand), but was wondering if there were any Republican Members or staffers who you remembered. David told me that our bill had gone to the Legislation and National Security Subcommittee of the Government Reform and Oversight Committee. Anything you can provide would be helpful.
