CENTER LANE currently rides the leading edge in the operational use of this emerging technology, indeed, drives the U.S. state of the art. If funding should be discontinued, this crucial momentum would be lost, and the national intelligence community would lose a valuable, unique, and cost-effective collection capability which now allows penetration of targets inaccessible to any conventional system. The long training lead-time required to develop source personnel would make later resumption of a viable program extremely difficult and time consuming.
