First impressions of the site involved a flat, humid, stifling, claustrophobic area surrounded by dense trees and other vegetation, a long, wooden structure like a boardwalk or pier, and short, dark complected people who were unpleasant, feral, callous, and full of bravado. There were lots of little black flying bugs. A ship was cued. Ship was perceived as large, metal, with blue/black hull and white upper portions, white painted fixtures, reasonably well kept. Funnel was red with white and blue bands, and black. Containers on board. Ship is filled with them, and they are also secured in rows on deck, fore and aft. Superstructure is nearer the back than the front. Impression that there is something illegal here being transported besides the drugs, though most of what is aboard is legit. Impression is that a container on top-most level, left side of ship facing forward, second or third container from the front, is of most interest. When it is opened, it presents a sheet of heavy plastic sealing the end, which is a normal practice. Beyond the plastic are neat stacks of bags, perhaps most of the way to the top, which look much like cement bags. The material of interest is contained in similar bags packed towards the center of the mass. It is not easy to get at. Cue of "offloading" produced impression that contraband is offloaded at a normal offloading place--a long cement platform alongside which the ship comes, with a nearby large, voluminous structure. Containers are moved inside to store. One container is moved apart from the others, perhaps moved to another location with a semi-tractor. It is unloaded inside a dark, deserted structural space. Geographic location is "like" continental US. Temperate climate, weak winter-like sunlight. Air is nippy, can see breath, but it isn't extremely cold. Some people on land helping with unloading have a general idea what's going on and are aiding and abetting. A/S of low-level bureaucrats. "Paper shufflers." One is at ship--tie, light blue long-sleeved shirt, clipboard, receding hair line, somewhat pot-belly, middle aged--late forties, early fifties. This location is terminus for the ship. Any intermediate stops are not relevant for this operation.
