Summary of Information

Room in question is partially under the ground, partially under the structure. There are at least three rooms or spaces at this level, only one of which is of interest. Access into the room of interest from these other spaces is closed off, at least partly due to the fact that the level of contents in the room of interest is so high as to block passage into it. There is also the sense that these ingress/egress points would be sealed anyway to limit and control access to the area. The only usable access to the room is from the outside rear of the structure, and is a set of masonry stairs leading down to below ground level. Once through the door, the stairs become wood. There is an impression that trucks pull up to this stairway/door to load and unload quantities of material. It is stuffy, still, dark, and close in this areas surrounding the room of interest, and these other spaces have the air of not being used much.

There are stairs from the inside of the structure above into the room to the left of the room of interest, and the space on the other side has the feeling of having been used to garage cars and as a shop/maintenance space for vehicles, but is no longer used much, either. It does, however, seem to have access to the outside, as if through openable garage doors.
